

THE PR OFFICE <sup>[PRO]</sup>

Conference of European Rabbis

Coverage Update 10th May 2019

Publication: The Jerusalem Post (online)
Date: 03.05.19
1/4

THE JERUSALEM POST

US SYNAGOGUES NEED WHAT EUROPEANS HAVE – ARMED GUARDS

BY RABBI PINCHAS GOLDSCHMIDT / MAY 3, 2019 02:51

4 minute read

A San Diego County Sheriff's Deputy secures the scene of a shooting incident at the Congregation Chabad synagogue in Poway, north of San Diego, California, U.S. April 27, 2019.. (photo credit: JOHN GASTALDO/REUTERS)

Publication: The Jerusalem Post (online)
Date: 03.05.19
2/4

THE JERUSALEM POST

MOSCOW – Whether it's a white supremacist targeting praying Jews, blacks or Muslims, or an Islamic radical committed to killing Christians on Easter Sunday, it has become very trendy to attack houses of worship.

Read More Related Articles

- President Kennedy gave Israel a strong warning about its nuclear reactor
- Jews: A nation of teetotalers?
- How much do you need to save for retirement? \(Fidelity \(Capital at Risk\)\)

Recommended by Outbrain |

In Europe, synagogues unfortunately have been targeted by terrorists for quite some time, including deadly attacks at the Great Synagogue of Vienna in 1981 and the Great Synagogue of Rome in 1982. In the past 15 years, Jewish institutions have been targeted by Muslim radicals in France, Belgium and Denmark. In my own community, on the eve of Passover this year, a terrorist targeted the Torath Haim Yeshiva in a Moscow suburb, burning down an annex of the building.

As a result of terror attacks against synagogues and Jewish businesses, many of Europe's Jews have ceased to attend Jewish events or have made aliyah to Israel – something that might happen soon in the United States. In the wake of two synagogue shootings, the situation for Jews in the United States is unfortunately starting to look very much like the situation in Europe, where communities have increased the security of their synagogues, community centers and schools.

But unlike European synagogues, which are secured like fortresses, synagogues in the United States still often have little or no security.

If U.S. synagogues want to improve this situation, then either the government or Jewish institutions must rise to the challenge.

Governments don't always like to help.

In Switzerland, the government balked at the need to chip in, claiming that the Jews are rich enough to take care of themselves. The Conference of European Rabbis had to convene side events at the Munich Security Conference to

Publication: The Jerusalem Post (online)
Date: 03.05.19
3/4

THE JERUSALEM POST

galvanize European governments to assist the Jewish communities of Europe with the additional security burden.

In contrast, the United Kingdom, France and Germany have been very helpful to their communities, and others are following suit.

In the United States, the Secure Community Network, run by the Jewish Federations of North America and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, is one Jewish organization attempting to meet this challenge. However, during my last visit to the United States, I was dismayed at the extent to which U.S. synagogues are less secure than European ones.

Often the best security measures and provisions require local communal efforts in conjunction with law enforcement agencies. And while law enforcement officers routinely work with important U.S. Jewish institutions, what is needed is a radical overhaul of all security measures in order to adapt to new realities.

For example, to prevent another Pittsburgh or Poway, the entrance to any Jewish institution should be controlled to make sure that no unknown person can enter.

The liberal gun laws in the United States are part of the problem, but they can also be part of the solution. If one or two armed and trained congregants were on duty inside synagogues at all times, the immediate response to an armed attack might reduce the number of casualties. If a gunman could be stopped before creating carnage, copycat attackers might be deterred from following through with their murderous intentions. This is the practice in many of Europe's communities that struggle to come up with the cash needed for security.

Recruiting young professionals to this initiative could help give a sense of purpose and unity to many younger Jews still finding a place in the community, and also will help lower the cost of security for many congregations.

The average cost of providing security eats up nearly 25 percent of the annual budget for a midsize community like Zurich and Munich, up to 50 percent for isolated communities like Helsinki.

I remember arriving in Jerusalem following the attack against a synagogue in the Ramot neighborhood that resulted in terrible carnage. When I prayed in a little neighborhood synagogue and dozens of people gathered for prayers, I always asked myself, "and what if one of them just takes a knife from his pocket and starts stabbing everyone

Publication: The Jerusalem Post (online)
Date: 03.05.19
4/4

THE JERUSALEM POST

around him?"

When a soldier with a gun joined the prayer, I calmed down.

Of course, a major aspect of security is deterrence and control of who is entering the premises. In the Forward, columnist Peter Beinart recalled how he recently had to recite the Shema in order to enter a synagogue in Amsterdam. I don't know how many Jews in the United States know the Shema (that's a separate problem), but having members at the entrance to identify worshippers is a well-practiced tradition in many European communities.

With God's help and the right approach, we can meet this challenge head-on and avert further crises. But it will require a hard look at how we secure our synagogues, and a commitment to investing the requisite time and resources.

<https://www.jpost.com/Diaspora/Antisemitism/US-synagogues-need-what-Europeans-have-armed-guards-588587>

Publication: The Times of Israel (online)
Date: 05.05.19
1/5

THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

US synagogues need what Europeans have – armed guards

Liberal gun laws in the United States are part of the problem, but they can also be part of the solution

Two police officers stand guard in front of the new Regensburg Synagogue in Germany, Feb. 27, 2019. (Andreas Gebert/Getty Images)

MOSCOW (JTA) – Whether it's a white supremacist targeting praying Jews, blacks or Muslims, or an Islamic radical committed to killing Christians on Easter Sunday, it has become very trendy to attack houses of worship.

In Europe, synagogues unfortunately have been targeted by terrorists for

Publication: The Times of Israel (online)

Date: 05.05.19

2/5

THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

quite some time, including deadly attacks at the Great Synagogue of Vienna in 1981 and the Great Synagogue of Rome in 1982. In the past 15 years, Jewish institutions have been targeted by Muslim radicals in France, Belgium and Denmark. In my own community, on the eve of Passover this year, a terrorist targeted the Torath Haim Yeshiva in a Moscow suburb, burning down an annex of the building.

As a result of terror attacks against synagogues and Jewish businesses, many of Europe's Jews have ceased to attend Jewish events or have made aliyah to Israel — something that might happen soon in the United States. In the wake of two synagogue shootings, the situation for Jews in the United States is unfortunately starting to look very much like the situation in Europe, where communities have increased the security of their synagogues, community centers and schools.

But unlike European synagogues, which are secured like fortresses, synagogues in the United States still often have little or no security.

If US synagogues want to improve this situation, then either the government or Jewish institutions must rise to the challenge.

Governments don't always like to help.

In Switzerland, the government balked at the need to chip in, claiming that the Jews are rich enough to take care of themselves. The Conference of European Rabbis had to convene side events at the Munich Security

Publication: The Times of Israel (online)

Date: 05.05.19

3/5

THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

Conference to galvanize European governments to assist the Jewish communities of Europe with the additional security burden.

In contrast, the United Kingdom, France and Germany have been very helpful to their communities, and others are following suit.

In the United States, the Secure Community Network, run by the Jewish Federations of North America and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, is one Jewish organization attempting to meet this challenge. However, during my last visit to the United States, I was dismayed at the extent to which US synagogues are less secure than European ones.

Often the best security measures and provisions require local communal efforts in conjunction with law enforcement agencies. And while law enforcement officers routinely work with important US Jewish institutions, what is needed is a radical overhaul of all security measures in order to adapt to new realities.

For example, to prevent another Pittsburgh or Poway, the entrance to any Jewish institution should be controlled to make sure that no unknown person can enter.

The liberal gun laws in the United States are part of the problem, but they can also be part of the solution. If one or two armed and trained congregants were on duty inside synagogues at all times, the immediate

Publication: The Times of Israel (online)

Date: 05.05.19

4/5

THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

response to an armed attack might reduce the number of casualties. If a gunman could be stopped before creating carnage, copycat attackers might be deterred from following through with their murderous intentions. This is the practice in many of Europe's communities that struggle to come up with the cash needed for security.

Recruiting young professionals to this initiative could help give a sense of purpose and unity to many younger Jews still finding a place in the community, and also will help lower the cost of security for many congregations.

The average cost of providing security eats up nearly 25 percent of the annual budget for a midsize community like Zurich and Munich, up to 50 percent for isolated communities like Helsinki.

I remember arriving in Jerusalem following the attack against a synagogue in the Ramot neighborhood that resulted in terrible carnage. When I prayed in a little neighborhood synagogue and dozens of people gathered for prayers, I always asked myself, "and what if one of them just takes a knife from his pocket and starts stabbing everyone around him?"

When a soldier with a gun joined the prayer, I calmed down.

Of course, a major aspect of security is deterrence and control of who is entering the premises. In the Forward, columnist Peter Beinart recalled how he recently had to recite the Shema in order to enter a synagogue in

Publication: The Times of Israel (online)
Date: 05.05.19
5/5

THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

Amsterdam. I don't know how many Jews in the United States know the Shema (that's a separate problem), but having members at the entrance to identify worshippers is a well-practiced tradition in many European communities.

With God's help and the right approach, we can meet this challenge head-on and avert further crises. But it will require a hard look at how we secure our synagogues, and a commitment to investing the requisite time and resources.

—

The views and opinions expressed in this article are those of the author and do not necessarily reflect the views of JTA or its parent company, 70 Faces Media.

<https://blogs.timesofisrael.com/us-synagogues-need-what-europeans-have-armed-guards/>

Publication: Jewish Insider (online)
Date: 06.05.19

JEWISHINSIDER

In an interview with Reuters while in Israel, Carr said, “The United States is willing to review its relationship with any country, and certainly antisemitism on the part of a country with whom we have relations is a deep concern. I will be raising that issue in bilateral meetings that I am undertaking all over the world. That is something we are going to have frank and candid conversations about – behind closed doors.”

Carr will address the Kyiv Jewish Forum and meet with Ukrainian government officials and Jewish community representatives on Monday. He will then travel to Poland, Hungary and Brussels to meet with government officials, NGOs and Jewish community leaders. Carr will conclude his overseas trip with an address at the Conference of European Rabbis in Antwerp on May 14.

<http://jewishinsider.com/16426/daily-kickoff-most-of-congress-condemns-hamas-bolton-warns-iran-nba-and-ramadan-harrison-formans-startup-livestreams-first-dates/>

Publication: Jewish Tribune
Date: 08.05.19

US shuls need what Europeans have: armed guards on patrol

Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt
MOSCOW (JTA)

Whether it's a white supremacist targeting praying Jews, blacks or Muslims, or an Islamic radical committed to killing Christians on Easter Sunday, it has become very trendy to attack houses of worship.

In Europe, shuls unfortunately have been targeted by terrorists for quite some time, including deadly attacks at the Great Synagogue of Vienna in 1981 and the Great Synagogue of Rome in 1982. In the past 15 years, Jewish institutions have been targeted by Muslim radicals in France, Belgium and Denmark. In my own community, on Erev Pessach this year, a terrorist targeted the Toras Chaim Yeshiva in a Moscow suburb, burning down an annex of the building.

As a result of terror attacks against shuls and Jewish businesses, many of Europe's Jews have ceased to attend Jewish events or have made aliyah to Israel — something that might happen soon in the United States. In the wake of two synagogue shootings, the situation for Jews in the United States is unfortunately starting to look very much like the situation in Europe, where communities have increased the security of their synagogues, community centres and schools.

But unlike European shuls, which are secured like fortresses, shuls in the United States still often have little or no security.

If U.S. synagogues want to improve this situation, then either the government or Jewish institutions must rise to the challenge.

Governments don't always like to help.

In Switzerland, the government balked at the need to chip in, claiming that the Jews are rich enough to take care of themselves. The Conference of European Rabbis had to convene side events at the Munich Security Conference to galvanize European governments to assist the Jewish communities of Europe with the additional security burden.

In contrast, the UK, France and Germany have been very helpful to their communities, and others are following suit.

In the United States, the Secure Community Network, run by the Jewish Federations of North

Armed guards outside Brussels shul

America and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, is one Jewish organization attempting to meet this challenge. However, during my last visit to the United States, I was dismayed at the extent to which U.S. synagogues are less secure than European ones.

Often the best security measures and provisions require local communal efforts in conjunction with the police. And while police officers routinely work with important U.S. Jewish institutions, what is needed is a radical overhaul of all security measures in order to adapt to new realities.

For example, to prevent another Pittsburgh or Poway, the entrance to any Jewish institution should be controlled to make sure that no unknown person can enter.

The liberal gun laws in the United States are part of the problem, but they can also be part of the solution. If one or two armed and trained congregants were on duty inside synagogues at all times, the immediate response to an armed attack might reduce the number of casualties. If a gunman could be stopped before creating carnage, copycat attackers might be deterred from following through with their murderous intentions. This is the practice in many of Europe's communities that struggle to come up with the cash needed for security.

Recruiting young professionals to this initiative could help give a sense of purpose and unity to many younger Jews still finding a place in the community, and also will help lower the cost of security for many congregations.

The average cost of providing security eats up nearly 25 percent of the annual budget for a midsize community like Zurich and Munich, up to 50 percent for isolated communities like Helsinki.

I remember arriving in Jerusalem following the attack against a shul in the Ramot neighbourhood that resulted in terrible carnage. When I davened in a little neighbourhood shul and dozens of people gathered for tefillah, I always asked myself, "and what if one of them just takes a knife from his pocket and starts stabbing everyone around him?"

When a soldier with a gun joined the minyan, I calmed down.

Of course, a major aspect of security is deterrence and control of who is entering the premises. In the Forward, columnist Peter Beinart recalled how he recently had to recite the Shema in order to enter a shul in Amsterdam. I don't know how many Jews in the United States know the Shema (that's a separate problem), but having members at the entrance to identify worshippers is a well-practised tradition in many European communities.

With Hashem's help and the right approach, we can meet this challenge head-on and avert further crises. But it will require a hard look at how we secure our shuls, and a commitment to investing the requisite time and resources.

The author is President of the Conference of European Rabbis

Seuda in London for yohrzeit of Rebbe Reb Shmelka of Nikulsborg and Rebbe Reb Avrohom Dov of Chamelnik at the Bilava shul.

Attending: Rav Yechezkel David Schlaff Blava Rov, Rav Yisocher Pinter Bikovske Rov, Rav Yitzchok Shteinvoizel Rosh Hakolei, Rav Avrohom Schlaff Rosh Yeshivas Bnei Zion, Rav Shloime Kuttainer Rosh Hakolei

“
THE AVERAGE COST OF
PROVIDING SECURITY
EATS UP NEARLY 25 PERCENT OF THE
ANNUAL BUDGET FOR A MIDSIZE COMMUNITY
LIKE ZURICH AND MUNICH

THE PR OFFICE <sup>PRO</sup>

Publication: The Jewish Advocate (online)

Date: 08.05.19

The Fifth Question

| May 08, 2019

By Gary Jacobson, M.D.
Advocate columnist

The Chief Rabbi of Moscow, Pinchas Goldschmidt, was in a good mood. "It is nice to see such diversity in front of me," he joked, "and all of us getting along so well."

He had travelled to be with us for the Pesach holidays near Thessaloniki, Greece. The diversity he referred to was within the 900 or so Jews from Israel, England, France, Belgium and the U.S., both Ashkenazi and Sephardi, and he was speaking of diversity of behavior, not of identity. Whether you ate rice on Pesach or didn't...

<https://www.thejewishadvocate.com/articles/the-fifth-question/>

